中考英语完形填空：学做糖葫芦

完形填空原文

During the winter holiday, I visited my grandmother in the countryside. She is famous in our village for making sweet candied hawthorn, which we call "tanghulu" in Chinese. One afternoon, she asked if I wanted to 1 how to make it. I agreed immediately because I had always loved eating it.

Grandmother first washed the fresh hawthorn fruits and dried them with a clean cloth. "The fruits must be completely dry," she said, "or the sugar coating will not 2 well." Then she threaded the fruits onto bamboo sticks, usually five or six on each stick. She made it look so 3, but when I tried, my fruits kept falling off.

"Don't rush. Hold the stick firmly and push the fruit through the centre," she told me. After many 4, I finally managed to string a few sticks. Grandmother smiled and said I was learning quickly.

The next step was the most exciting — making the sugar syrup. She heated sugar and water in a pot over a low fire. "We must watch the colour 5," she said. "When it turns golden, it's ready. If we take it off too early, the coating will be too soft. If we wait too long, it will become too hard."

When the syrup was ready, Grandmother quickly dipped each stick of hawthorn into the hot sugar. The fruits were covered with a shiny, transparent 6. She placed them on a greased board to cool. In a few minutes, the sugar hardened and the tanghulu was done.

I tried making one by myself. I was so nervous that my hand 7. The sugar dripped unevenly and my tanghulu looked ugly. Grandmother encouraged me, "The first time is always the hardest. You'll do better next time."

That evening, we sat together and enjoyed the tanghulu we had made. The sweet and sour taste brought back many happy 8 of my childhood. Grandmother said that making tanghulu was not just about the food — it was about passing down traditions and spending 9 time with family.

I felt very grateful for that day. I had not only learned a new skill but also understood the 10 of family traditions. When I go back to the city, I will try to make tanghulu for my friends and share this wonderful experience with them.
